Britain's first guided bus scheme was unched in a Birmingham suburb esterday with enthusiastic declarations about its potential amid protests from

The project is being developed by the West Midlands Passenger Executive, the Labour-controlled county council, Metro Cammell Weymann and GKN.

The route into central Birmingham is predicted to cut traffic congestion and reduce bus journey times by up to 10 per cent. Some Conservatives, however, have condemned it as wasteful, an eyesore and a disastrous joke. Some residents are also annoyed at the central reservation being used and believe that children and the elderly could be in danger

Modified buses on the route are dual-purpose. They operate conventionally on roads but, once they enter the Tracline system guided-wheels 62 -- as fitted to the front wheels fit into steel rails on the sides. of the raised section of the concrete track, eliminating the need to steer.

Dangers in home grown vegetables

By Tony Samstag

A scientist in Birmingham has nearthed some of the most conclusive evidence to date that people who grow their own regetables in or near British cities are at risk from cadmium poisoning, which can cause kidney damage. Mr Christopher Tennant of Aston University's department of environmental health told The Times yesterday that maximum cadmium levels in some vegetables he studied were up to three times those found in the Somerset village of Shipham, where a cadmium scare in 1979 prompted a series of epidemiological studies that are still continuing.

The gardens of almost 200 families in the borough of Walsall, West Midlands, were analysed for cadmium contamination and 96 households were monitored more closely, Familtes were chosen for study only it they grew at least 70 per cent o the vegetables they consumed. When Mr Tennant's team measured the quantities of cadmium consumed by the families, the highest consumption was 67 microgrammes a day, perilously close to the 70 microgramme "maximum tol-crable daily intake" set by United Nations scientists.

Almospheric fall-out from industry and careless waste disposal are probably the main reasons for a build-up of cadmium in soil through the

Today's debates

This morning's debates at conference will be on rates, defence and drug abuse. This afternoon, Mr Nigel Lawson, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, will reply to the debate on the economy and taxation. health and local government.

Government's real test, by Gummer

The real test for the Government would come when the violence in the miners' strike was over and when the strife was at an end, Mr John Gummer, chairman of the party, told delegates.

When the tyranny had been tamed the Government must show itself without rancour, ready and eager to rebuild and to heal.

That, he told the conference in his address, would be even more difficult than being firm in its determination now to uphold the right to hold fast to principle. Where Arthur Scargili had shown the unacceptable face of trade unionism the Government must help men to build again their ovalty to a democratic and representative NUM. Where Mr Scargill had torn communities apart. the Government must seek to beal and mend. In Blackpool they had witnessed the coronation of King Arthur and his usurpation of the mantle of leadership. Therefore it was the deputy leader of the Labour Party, Mr Neil Kinnock, who had sought to reaffirm his opposition to violence. But Mr Kinnock has not told it straight. He had not put his leadership on destroy the democratic insti-tutions of Britain. Mr Walker received a standing ovation and during the debate so did the wife of a working miner, Mrs Irene McGibson, of Dover, who is national organizer of the miners wives' Back to Work campaign.

The takeover by the left and the cowardice of the Labour moderates was the real challenge to Conservatives. The many whose traditional Labour loyalties had been strained to breaking point were looking for a lead, and only the Conservative Party could give it.

Mr Derek Ridge, Newark, successfully moved a motion calling on the Government to embark on a vigorous programme to restore the pride and confidence of all those working within the coal industry, and to

Backing to protect pensions

Nothing was more important in helping pensioners than that the Government's achievement in controlling inflation should be maintained, and the Government meant to do this, Mr Antony Newton, Minister for Social Security, told the conference. He said that nothing more quickly undermined people's planning for retirement, or their security when retired, than rapidly rising prices.

The Government demonstrating its conviction that a crucial part of securing the future welfare of the retired must be still further to broaden the opportunity for people to build their own pensions from their own savings.

The debate was opened by Mr Michael Jack, Southport, who moved a resolution calling in a motion on the Government to develop further its social policies to ensure that those who had given a lifetime service to society could look forward to retirement free from economic and social worry. He said the conference had to show that retirement was not the beginning of the slippery slope to deteriorating living conditions. They had to show that care and concern about pensioners was not the preserve of the Labour Party, Jack Jones and even some bishops.

Mr Newton, Minister of State for Social Security, said after a long review of the government's velfare achievements that in the dispute involving staff at the Newcastle computer centre they were not prepared to accept the deliberate continuation of an unnecessarily expensive pattern of shifts. The Government had a clear duty not only to taxpayers but to claimants to ensure economy in adminis-

Policy 'not always well presented'

Following the Conservative's remarkable success in last year's general election, the media felt it was time to cut the party down to size. Lord Whitelaws Lord President of the Council and deputy leader, said when replying to a debate on public

He admitted that there had been times when policies had they had to recognize their mistakes and build on their successes.

They had to remember the value of repetition and repeat again and again the simple message anbout the miners' dispute. If there were no mass pickets, no violence on the picket lines, and no intimidation of working miners in their homes and on their way to work, there would be no need for a large police presence, nor would there be one.

Those organizing the mass picketing and violence should call it off instead of hypocritically blaming the police for doing their duty.

The conference carried unanimously a resolution urging the Government to "smarten up its public relations" and to explain its policies lucidly.

Smith The Conservative conference displayed once again yesterday greatest weakness.

The greatest strength it has shown down the years is that under pressure it usually presents a united face to the world in support of the party leadership, So it was not really surprising that there was no inclination to rock the boat by seriously questioning the Covernment's tactics over the miners' strike.

But the greatest weakn that the conference has traditionally displayed is a failure ditionally displayed is a father often even to reveal and certainly to debate thoroughly the critical disagreements within the party. There are two major criticisms of the Government's handling of this strike that are made by a good many Conservatives who have no shred of sympathy for Arthur shred of sympathy for Arthur Scargill. Neither criticism re-ceived much of an airing at Brighton yesterday.

One of the principle com-plaints is that the Government has left too much of the case against the NUM to be made by the chairman of the coal board whose expertise lies in management not public relati-weight to that criticism. if the! full range of the Government's case had been deployed more often with such skill there might have been less embar-rassment from the bisbops.

The other main complaint is that too heavy a responsibility has been placed upon the police. The Government has declined to use its new legislation so as to bring the civil law into play. Nor have the long-standing powers of the criminal law been deployed so as to remove the abuses of mass

As the representatives yes terday cheered the many well merited criticisms of violence and intimidation on the picket line, many must often have been asking themselves (CIIII (1)) has to be accepted nowadays as inevitable in a major strike in this country. Is there no alternative to asking the police to take the strain day after day in a war of attrition? Is the Government's much-vaunted legislation inappropriate in those cases where it is most needed? Only once or twice did such questions emerge in the course of debate in the conference hall. A statement from the National Association of Conservative: Graduates pointed out that the regulation of picketing by a civil law...depends all too often on the tactical choices of the employer". The statement went on to call foe a new law making it a criminal offence for there to be more than six pickets at each more than six pickets at each entrance of a piace of work, while acknowledging that such a reform would not be an answer to be organized mass.

Condemnations of violence

Perhaps there is indeed no valid alternative to a war of attrition in those instances where a militant union is prepared neither to compro-mise nor to show restraint. But the danger of having to rely upon such a strategy is that it can easily run counter to the deep instinct in this country which is dobious of pursuing any policy very far if it results in civil conflict.

It is because they fear this instinct, not because they have an alternative economic strategy to offer, that the bisbops

The nature of the challenge by Mr Scargill's tactics has been recognized from the first by Mrs Thatcher. "What about the violence? What about the violence? What about the violence? What about the violence? What about the violence?" she would see time violence?" she would ask time and again when ministers were offering reassuring analyses in the early days of the strike.

The conference heard many comdemnations of violence yesterday, buit did not really come to grips with the question as to whether there was any better way of dealing with it. This is a question that will have to be debated seriously. not least by a governing party that has attached so much importance to reforming the law on trade unions and always gives such high priority to preserving public order. NHS charges defended

Mr Kenneth Clarke, Minister of Health, said vesterday that it was time the Government stopped feeling guilty about putting up health service charges.

He told a conference fringe meeting that Britain was the envy of other countries for the value for money obtained from the National Health Service.

His own "good health league" showed that Britain spent a smaller proportion of its gross domestic product on health, than 10 other developed countries. "But in terms of any index you can make on the quality of health care, mortality rates for different diseases, the standards of health which the generality of the population enjoys, we come fourth, and a good fourth, not far behind Sweden, the Netherlands and Switzerland", he said.

Britain's efficiency record in health was so sood that Mr Clarke was constantly asked by health ministers from other countries how the NHS could manage to deliver such high standards when spending, in real terms, was only increasing at a rate of 1 per cent a year.

Speaking of future financing methods, Mr

Clarke said that all the alternatives had been firmly rejected by the Government. "The serious runners don't run., he said. But he added: "At long last, we have stopped feeling quite so guilty about charging policy. Successive governments have charged for dental services, optical services, and prescription charges since 1951.

Challenger Protest over crew repair | Britons held cooling unit in Nigeria

From Mohsin Ali Washington

The crew of the space shuttle Challenger yesterday worked in high cabin temperatures to repair a faulty cooling system and continued with scientific observations of the Earth's surface and weather.

Nature added to the Challenger's woes on Monday, when the crew of five men and two women spent more than 12 hours without their main communication link with Earth. Cosmic activity had temporarily disrupted a key data transmission satellite.

Monday's satellite trouble occurred as the Challenger's crew trained its radar camera on Earth's deserts, jungles and seas. However, the craft's experimental radar mapper continued to store pictures on recording tape for replay later via satellite.

The crew worked in cabin temperatures which suddenly rose to an uncomfortable 90°F after emptying the crafts waste tanks while their heaters were on to clear ice that may have formed on outside vents.

On the previous shuttle mission, ice had blocked the vents and the crew knocked it off with the shuttle's robot arm.

Barclays keeps constant watch over world money markets... with help from the unique technologies of Control Data.

In today's fast-changing international banking A climate, currency trades are only as good as the information they are based on. Fast access to statistical, limit and background data, and first-class communications that provide instant knowledge, are no longer a luxury-they are critical to success.

For Chris Pavlou, Senior Vice-President, and the other foreign exchange and money market traders of Barclays Bank International Ltd. in New York, price differentials of a fraction of a cent create profits or losses.

So, much of this critical information is, provided with the aid of a Control Data Arbat Banking System. This advanced combination of hardware and software helps the Bank benefit from greater control of its international currency positions.

The Arbat System allows traders to have immediate real-time information at their fingertips - information which is used to build trading strategies.

The System gives instant mismatch information, continually updates limit utilisation and availability, and permits instant call-up of the vital statistical data needed to control a high-risk trading operation.

Banking installations across the World Currently Control Data Arbat Banking Systems are also installed in the Bank's major centres in Tokyo, Hong Kong and Singapore, and are being extended to 15 other locations.

Arbat systems are only one part of the facilities offered by Control Data, which also include specialised links to external and internal information services, and worldwide communication networks.

These are only some of the company's many remarkable achievements. Control Data is a world leader in supercomputers and there are smaller systems to bring unique benefits to industry and commerce. It is the world's largest independent supplier of computer peripherals. In the manufacture of magnetic disks and tapes, in industrial skills training and computerbased education, in banking and financial services, and in assistance to small business, Control Data has used its technologies to establish a unique position in the world of high technology

Why nuclear shelters are booming buildings suitable for communal projection.

The recent television programmes have prompted a surge in demand for private nuclear shelters: There are probably about 800 throughout yourself shelters provided by individuals for themselves from a range displayed by the Home Office in 1981. A revised edition of Protect and Survive, the government civil defence booklet, is expected to include updated shelter design. The Home Office is to ask councils to survey.

Public interest has also been captured by The Defence Diaries of W. Morgan Petty. edited by Brian Bethell, a saltre which tells how he turns his home into a nuclear-free zone, and takes over responsibility for his own security. The diaries have sold 0,000 in hardback so far. The Journal of Practical Civil Defence provides more serious guidance. A bi-monthly, its 5,000 circulation is said to be rising.

THE TIMES

Compared to other manufacturers' attempts at saving fuel, the revolutionary BMW 525e is like a breath of fresh air.

In fact, one of its more startling achievements is literally that—the ability to use air where lesser cars use petrol.

Thanks to a unique electronic management system, the eta engine runs on a mixture so lean it would make normal cars suffer through fuel starvation.

And where normal cars waste precious petrol running at high revs, the BMW 525e produces most of its power at the lower, economical end of the rev range.

Yet not content with advances made in the engine, BMW engineers turned their attention to the gearbox.

The result is an extraordinary 4-speed automatic which uses less fuel than a manual.

At 70 mph this long legged BMW is merely dawdling at 2000 rpm, whilst returning fuel consumption figures which look like misprints.

37.7 mpg at 75 mph; and at 56 mph the eta can stretch every gallon to an incredible 47.9 miles.

And the remarkable thing about such frugal progress is that it isn't achieved at the expense of legendary BMW performance.

A 27 litresix-cylinder engine, developing 125 bhp, sees to that.

Yet power and economy isn't the whole story. This engine is also built to reduce friction.

And where there's less friction, there's less wear and less noise, making the eta engine one of the most refined and quietest engines around.

And all this without sacrificing any of BMW's renowned driver appeal.

In fact, the BMW 525e exhibits every attribute of a traditional luxury saloon, save one.

You can't argue with glass that talks

Some time ago two bright STC scientists came up with a rather novel idea. They were experimenting with threads of pure glass the thickness of human hair as a possible practical optical wave-guide with important potential in a new form of communication.

Oprical fibre transmission had been born. Even in those early days, nobody could argue with its potential for having an almost unlimited capacity for high quality signals.

Over the years, we've remained in the forefront of the production and technical perfection of optical fibre in the UK.

After having developed the first practical transmission system between Hitchin and Stevenage we opened Europe's first factory for optical fibre cable.

We have produced the world's first high-capacity commercial singlemode optical system that operates between Luton and Milton Keynes.

And currently we're producing the world's first international underwater optical fibre cable system.

Key components in both these systems are high-powered STC lasers for signal transmission. All these things demonstrate the international scale of STC's transmission activity.

Thanks to inventions like talking glass, British communications has a future well worth speaking of.

If you would like to take a closer look at how STC is shaping the future, we'll be delighted to send you our colour brochure. Write to:

As the hunt continues for the mole who told The Times of the plot to oust Edward Du Cann as chairman of the 1922 Committee, the finger of suspicion - in Brighton - was being pointed at Du Cann himself. The suggestion - which I am assured is without foundation - comes from those who vividly recall Du Cann brilliantly manipulating the press when his position as party chairman was in jeopardy in 1966. Believing Heath was trying to sack him. Du Cann phoned the Daily Mail's Walter Terry and told all. When the story appeared, surprised Tory bigwigs naturally had to deny any such intentions and were forced to express their - and Heath's - total confidence in Du Cann who, as a result, he survived for another year.

Edinburgh's upper classes have, to say the least, had their collective nose disjointed. It went almost without saying that when Ludovic Kennedy announced his resignation as chaiman of the board of the Royal Lyceum Theatre, his nominee. Menzies Campbell QC, would succeed him. That, however, was to reckon without Edinburgh's new Labour District Council. In May, five of its newly elected councillors took their places on the board and objected en bloc to Campbell's establishment credentials. They proposed Angus Calder, a writer whose political views more closely accord with their own. Stalemate ensued, the dispute rumbled on, and now, months later, it is to be settled by a vote. It is, says Kennedy, the PHS the government admits only to injuries from "stray bullets". But the health ministry admitted that 102 first he can remember the board ever taking.

A virulent new disease is afflicting British politics. Economics is bad enough, but the decline of language, meaning and rational debate is even worse. As the din of the Labour Party conference dies away, an acrid smell lingers like cordite in the

On the central issues of economics and defence, the Party of the official Opposition has simply withdrawn from the debate, and the trite slogan "action, not words" has acquired a new and sinister meaning on the left. When words fail, violence follows, as sections of the national community are lost to reason. When the Prime Minister speaks to her Party, she must find language to unblock ears of those who "do not want to know", and reopen the national debate. Who knows, the Government might learn something too.

The first need is for clarity. It is far 100 easy to talk of polarization. True, the Government tends to forget that not everyone is well placed to withstand the rigours of competition, and should moderate its language accordingly. But if we all begin to think of ourselves as an elderly and infirm country which deserves a respite from realism opposition, the Government should show itself more ready to encourage debate in the country as a whole. Nigel Lawson made a start by producing a surprisingly readable 10-year forward look on public expenditure. If, as it seems, not many bishops have read it, something more accessible is needed for the rest of us. Above all, critics should be encouraged to put forward practical proposals to combat employment. As emotion takes over, intelligent men on the left are driven to defend outrageous illogicalities, such as the claim that Britain was ready to use nuclear weapons against Argentina, but that Russia would never use them against us. The biggest mistake the Government could make would be to overreact to Labour's new primitivism if only because it would give Mr Scargill exactly what he wants. In beginning a new dialogue with the country, the Government must not only find a new language, but be careful to speak over his head.

Where vouchers would be valid

ers dominate this year's Conservative Party education debate. Thus, at first sight, the concern with schools has moved to much lighter issues. Vouchers would have involved a radical reform of the state school system, with state and private schools charging fees and parents being given the financial wherewithal to pay those fees at the school of their choice. Peace studies, in contrast, appear to involve little more than tightening up on abuses in one tiny sector of the curriculum.

The Government backed down over vouchers because the changes required were too great. The challenges, opportunities and prob-lems which vouchers presented were too much even for the politicians of "conviction". For all its advocacy of entrepreneurship, the Cabinet was afraid of taking risks. Instead, the recent green paper offers the minority of activist parents more control of schools through greater representation on governing bodies

Bennism with an impermanent

Meanwhile the Government has increased its interest in the curriculum. It is attempting to support subjects which need support, such as English, and reduce subjects which have a questionable right to be in the curriculum at all, such as peace studies. Last week's HMI report on standardizing the objectives of English language teaching to ensure that, after 11 years of compulsory schooling, pupils should be able to read, speak and write properly will be welcomed by parents and employers, if not by all teachers. Many parents will share the minister's worries about the susceptibility of bogus subjects such as peace studies to propaganda and indoctrination.

However different these curriculum preoccupations may appear from a policy radically to reform the funding of schools, a government which thinks deeply about the former will be led, inevitably, back to the latter. For peace studies are not inherently bad and certainly not to be banned. It is simply that they have no place in a school which pupils are compelled to attend by law and towards which taxpayers are compelled to contribute.

Peace studies are indeed to be welcomed: especially if they are taught by appeasers, communists and well-intentioned, ill-informed dupes, because they set us looking at the curriculum in this way: what other subjects are there which have no place in a nationalized coercive school system? More positively, what subjects are there that might more appropriately be learned elsewhere in the community?

Prominent candidates for education outside school are sex education, mother tongue languages of linguistic minority groups, religious instruction, music, "play", sports, some foreign languages, community service, vocationalindustrial education and that function so excessively, inappropriately, exorbitantly and inadequately per-formed by schools, child minding.

If coercive state schools concentrated on subjects widely recognized as essential for everyone such as English or maths, which they should best be able to teach, they could leave parents to choose the extramural parts of their children's education as they wish, paying for them with vouchers financed by the reduced cost of schools operating a reduced curriculum. Schools would obviously have to abandon their unmerited monopoly of daylight hours, perhaps working a continen-tal day or, for optimum use of plant, a two-shift day.

Extra-mural education would be provided by voluntary groups, religious and community organizations, profit-oriented educational specialists and firms anxious to acquire an appropriately trained workforce. No doubt propagandists would emerge to offer peace studies, perhaps even courses in hating the police, in a bunker somewhere, and if parents wished to pay for their children to attend and the children actually turned up, so be it. Extramural education happens already, of course, but it is forced into evenings and weekends and the state takes so much money in taxes for schools that poorer income groups have little left to spend on the non-school education they would choose for their children.

At present the choice is stark: packaged state education or packaged private education. No mixture of the two is allowed; take it or leave it. To take any significant amount of private education, you must take full-time private education at full-time prices. But there is no reason the choice should be so exclusive. And the key to opening up a practical choice is the close inspection of the curriculum, Many will agree that certain subjects ought to be provided at state schools, free at the point of consumption and attendance at them compulsory. But after inspecting the items on contemporary school curricula, few would agree that all are most appropriately provided in compulsory state schools. That is the lesson that peace studies teaches.

It should not be a difficult lesson for the Government to learn. The Cabinet is, presumably, not proud to preside over a schooling system rigid with socialist assumptions and socialist organization. If it believes its own rhetoric, it will recognize that the unit in society responsible for education is the family, not the NUT. The family contracts out some of that responsibility to the school system, but not all. It should be helped to contract out more of it where it chooses and thus fulfil its responsibility

The coal strike: Paul Routledge on the need for wider views divisions within the National Coal Board are not easy to decipher, but they appear to confirm persistent rumours of a growing divergence between the traditional mining engineers and their abrasive chairman, Mr Ian MacGregor.

When will the public be served?

If the signals are being read properly, some of the industry's managers want a deal - not on the current terms of the striking miners, but a deal all the same, that will allow the mines to get back into operation. Meanwhile the dominant Clan MacGregor require a once-andfor-all reassertion of the right to manage, and in that the hardliners have the powerful backing of Mrs Thatcher and her key ministers.

The mining engineers share the industrial objectives of their chairman, specifically to rid the industry of high-cost capacity, but there are nagging doubts about what is seen as the "political" objective of taking on the NUM in a fight to the finish. Their long experience of British coal mining suggests that there will be no winners in such an Armageddon.

In public, of course, the Coal Board presents a united front behind the MacGregor strategy. There is no splii: everybody agrees that the March 6 closure programme involing 20 pits and 20,000 jobs this year must go ahead. In private, however, the engineers are becoming increasingly concerned at the deteriorating conditions of the pits - and of relations with the men they have to manage. Even the safety brigades men responsible for rescues after underground calamities have now been withdrawn in Yorkshire and Northumberland, and picketing of colliery managers has begun.

It is against this backdrop that the three mining unions and the NCB sit down tomorrow to chart a way out of the 31-week-old strike. MacGregor will initially see leaders of the NUM, and the other two unions -Nacods representing the pit deputies, and BACM representing the management - are then expected to he drawn into the peace process. Acas officials say the meeting will "seek to find a basis for a resumption of work."

This is the first time such a form of words has been used in the seven or eight abortive attempts to achieve a settlement of the dispute. It suggests that getting back to work is the primary objective, and that some secondary - perhaps long-term objectives can be left to further negotiations between the parties aller the men go back.

seductive approach. At the moment, the only new proposal on the table is the deputies' idea of an independent "final appeal" procedure on colliery closures. The miners regard it as an interesting proposition, but insist that it does not address itself to the main point at issue: the March 6 closure programme. Only when that is withdrawn (not revised, or reappraised) will they order a return to work, they say.

If the Coal Board is persuaded to take such a radical step, and it is most unlikely to be so persuaded, the long-term aim of stabilizing the industry through some form of third-party appeal court adjudicating on future colliery closures could be realized.

However, it is all still at the drawing-board stage. The Board has indicated that it would accept "advice" from such a forum, but not binding arbitration. And no thought seems to have been given as to who would make up such a tribunal. Practically all the deep-mining expertise in Britain is concentrated in the NCB itself, though there are some academic experts in a handful of universities with mining depart-

MacGregor has not yet conceded the principle of third party inter-vention. The Board cites the 1946 Coal Industry Nationalization Act as its authority for insisting on retaining managerial hegemony, and the Act certainly does charge it with working and getting the coal in Great Britain to the exclusion of any other person", and "securing the efficient development of the coal mining industry.

But it also charges the Board with "making supplies of coal available of such qualities and sizes, in such quantities and at such prices, as may seem to them best calculated to further the public interest in all respects (my italies) including the avoidance of any undue or un-reasonable preference or advan-This form of words may be read

It may also be open to question whether the public interest is best served "in all respects" by the relentless pursuit of a strategy that has not worked despite a seven-

Unfortunately, tomorrow's talks that might break out of this deadlock take place in a sharply political context. The Tory Party is in conference and the High Court is today due to pronounce judgment on Scargill and his fellow NUM leaders for alleged contempt of orders restraining them from acting as though the strike is official.

The court will have to decide on the mineworkers' refusal to abide by decision that the strike in Yorkshire and Derbyshire is unofficial, in the knowledge that any upping of the ante by a judge could have desperately counter-productive results in terms of industrial relations. It is not likely that Scargill and his colleagues will be committed to jail on the application of his "dissident" members: more likely that his union will be fined heavily and then lay itself open to sequestration by refusing to pay the

This is not the textbook framework for restarting peace talks in a dispute that has divided the nation as well as the union. It has to be said that the miners rhetoric about winning the conflict now sounds more convincing than at any time since they came out nearly eight months ago. Both Scargill and MacGregor are beginning to sound like First World War generals, each insistent that the struggle must go on despite the sacrifices. But Scargill is looking over the hill at the prospect of fresh troops arriving from the TUC, in the shape of power and steel workers. The Transport Workers are already predicting power cuts in eight weeks time as a result of supportive action in line with last month's TUC deal.

The NCB could take retaliatory action, and the Government may use troops to move coal from the strike-bound pitheads if the national power grid is put at risk. These are endgame politics. Is it not time for the parties to determine jointly how to serve "the public interest in all respects", as the nationalization law laid down?

The plutonium that leaked away

When Lord Hinton died last year, an official statement from the CEGB described him as "uncompromising in his standards, unswerving in his integrity". Its chairman. Sir Walter Marshall, personally added his tribute to Lord Hinton's "immense dedication" and "strong, usually deadly accurate, sense of judgment". Whether Sir Walter would now be quite so unguarded in praising Lord Hinton's "deadly accurate sense of judgment" must be a matter of speculation, since this week sees the posthumous publication of an interview with Lord Hinton which records his judgment on the CEGB evidence to the Sizewell inquiry. In it he observes. "I am questioning the whole statement, because it is deplorable. I don't know whether they should get permission for a PWR (pressurized-water reactor) at Sizewell or not But what is important is that they shouldn't tell bloody lies in their evidence."

In the specific statement which drew Lord Hinton's fire was the claim by the CEGB witness that "no plutonium produced in CEGB reactors has been applied to weapons use either in the UK or elsewhere. Lord Hinton's dismissal of this assurance commands respect because his chairmanship coincided with the CEGB Magnox period. when it was constructing nuclear reactors originally designed for military purposes and superbly efficient in producing weaponsgrade plutonium.

Lord Hinton declined to be drawn as to whether CEGB plutonium had been applied to weapons use "in the UK or elsewhere", but anyone listening to the tape of the interview is left with the clear impression that he had in mind the American weapons programme. weapons programme. Here again Lord Hinton is a witness of weight because it was during his chairman-ship of the CEGB that the British Government negotiated the 1958 and 1959 defence agreements which provided for the export of plutonium from CEGB reactors to the US Defence Department in exchange for enriched uranium for our Polaris programme.

Polaris programme.

Why the Pentagon wanted the plutonium and what it did with it remains a mystery. A couple of years ago I tried to raise the matter in the Commons, and was assured by the minister replying for the govern-ment that nothing so crude as its use in warheads had taken place. In the light of Lord Hinton's brusque rebuttal of such claims, let me record my personal impression that the minister concerned, Mr John Moore, spoke in all good faith and subsequently took considerable pains to answer a series of pedantic written questions from me suspect it has taken place lower down among the nuclear priesthood, from whom he in turn had to prise his information.

in any event, the assurances which I then received were less than perfect. Our plutonium may not have been used for weapons but it had been applied to "other military purposes". The problem with this distinction is that the military have no real use for plutonium other than as an essential element in thermonuclear warheads. And indeed no one in America had much use for plutonium after Carter shut down the fast reactor programme.

It appears that what the US military did with our plutonium was to farm it out for various experimental purposes. Yet even this relatively innocuous use has been qualified by the recent assertion of a member of President Reagan's administration that this did not qualify as the end of our plutonium, which remained on loan from the military and available for recall whenever needed for weapons use.

British plutonium has yet been identified in various US energy establishments. This week also sees the publication of a calculation by nuclear scientists who have con-cluded that at least six tonnes of British plutonium is not accounted for in home inventories, and has pre sumably been exported to the US.

The clear implication is that two tonnes of the plutonium we have supplied to the US has gone missing vithout explanation, and the only likely place where such a large volume of explosive material could be sealed is in military stockpiles.

The emergence of such new and alarming information on the final destination of British plutonium is likely to infuriate that section of public opinion that is already deeply worried by the pace of the US nuclear programme. Most Britons who are opposed to accepting cruise missiles are unlikely to be reconciled to them by the possibility that their warheads are based on British plutonium.

Yet there is an even more profound significance to the recent revelations. For three decades the civil nuclear industry has maintained that its operations are entirely distinct from the military nuclean programme, and should not be condemned through guilt by associ-ation, a plea which now appears dangerously bogus. We always knew our civil nuclear reactors were born of military invention. We must now suspect that they have since been used to meet military necessity.

Doe's no-go areas as Liberia lingers under army rule

April 1980: summary justice for Tolbert's ousted ministers wounded had been treated, among Cheapoo, are among those now in jail. The LPP, whose leadership has borne the brunt of the assault, is regarded as moderate and social-democratic, with no radical economic plans. The LPP, and the dozen or so other parties that mushroomed after legalization, however, have shown an enthusiasm for campaigning that may have shaken Doe's resolve.

His actions have appeared arbitrary and contradictory. On August 13 he said all government ministers should resign within a week if they wanted to take part in the new electoral process. But he has still not done so himself despite having founded a political party, the National Democratic, Critics also point to Decree 88A of July 21, which makes a first-class felony of any statement or allegation which damages the reputation of members of the government.

And then there are the conditions attached to legal campaigning. Under the election rules, political parties must show they have a minimum $50,000 in cash and $100,000 in securities and bonds; so far only Doe's own party has done so. The others will not comply, they say, until they all told what will happen to the money after the elections. The conditions are reminiscent of the property restrictions which disenfranchized so many Liberians under the Tubmans and the Tolberts whom Doe overthrew.

But Decree 88A, and the recent amendment to election rules which permits the refusal of registration to parties which hold "adverse ideo-logical aims and objectives", have demolished what little credibility the return to civilian rule still had. Calls on Doe to resign have now reached a crescendo.

A recent sign of his nervousness was his order to the army to flog publicly anyone found distributing leaflets "intended to create chaos in society". He has also deplored the "high level of indiscipline in society" and said that no disturbance would prevent him reestablishing democracy.

Western diplomats have expressed their dismay at the recent repression, and their hopes that civilian rule will amount to more than the military in musti. However, Doe believes he is being no more autocratic than other African recipients of western support, and he is hoping that the Reagan adminis-tration will see things his way.

TIME FOR A NEW PLAN

The Energy Secretary's speech to the Conservative Party conference yesterday understandably emphasized the sheer reasonableness of the Government's position in the coal dispute. After the TUC and the Labour Party supported Mr Scargill's case, if not his methods, it was perhaps appropriate to underline what a good deal had been offered to the miners; to spell out the Government's record on helping the coal industry and its tuture commitment to it, and to contrast that with Mr Scargill's unreasonableness and thirst for confrontation. That line certainly won Mr Walker a long awaited standing ovation from the party faithful.

What Mr Walker's speech failed to do was to give any guidance about what will have to happen after the strike is over. How are ministers going to avoid a repeat performance when coal stocks are not so high? How are they to end subsidies of more than £1 billion a year indefinitely on anything like the terms still on the table from the National Coal Board and now being discussed with the pit deputies union? And how are taxpayers to avoid plunging an extra £1 billion a year into the industry ad infinitum?

It is ironic, but instructive, that Mr Walker's sheer reason-· ableness in treating the miners as a special case has almost certainly played a crucial role in prolonging the strike. He has in essence offered, and continues to offer, an unconditional one-way social compact, committing the Government to invest £3 billion over four years and eschew any compulsory redundancies regardless of the finances of the industry or the acceptance by the present structure.

National Union of Mineworkers of their side of the compact. No such offers were made to the steelmen, to BL workers or even to the National Health Service. It is unlikely that Sir Michael Edwardes could have turned round BL if they had. The have been miners alone exempted from the need to face commercial and financial realities. Had the Government's commitments been made conditional on miners' acceptance of the closure of the 15 per cent of current capacity that is irretrievuneconomic, then the majority of miners might have been more reluctant to fall in with Mr Scargill's rolling strike strategy at a much earlier stage.

There is still a strong case for withdrawing such unconditional commitments, though it is doubtful whether that would now have the same effect or credibility. Yesterday's debate certainly suggested the governing party now has no stomach for such a move.

There is, however, an overwhelming case for a fundamental rethink of the structure of the coal industry after the strike is over and for avoiding any commitments to maintain the industry or the National Coal Board in anything like their present form. A few years ago, it would have been hard to imagine the present prosperity of Jaguar or that its employees would be offered a pay deal that will give them high wages and bonuses that reflect the company's efficiency and prosperity. It would take self-delusion as well as imagination to imagine such a happy state of affairs in the coal industry under its

The need to bring in commercial forces, improve security of supply and to soften the effects of the aftermath of the strike on the fisc all argue in the same direction. To start with, the National Coal Board's role as a commercial business should be separated from its monopoly role as regulator of the industry and owner of mining rights. If the latter were vested in a separate state body, which hired out mining rights to the NCB and others, then the social and strategic aspects of uneconomic pits, as well as the overriding social obligation to help and support mining communities deprived of no-hope pits would properly be divorced from the commercial duties of the NCB.

In particular, there is no reason for profitable opencast mines, which are operated by construction workers working for private employers, to be kept artificially within the NCB's monopoly, where they have, it appears, been held back to help uneconomic deep mines. The opencast mines should be removed speedily from the public sector altogether.

A start should also be made with privatizing the more viable deep mine areas. This should preferably be achieved by sale or transfer to organizations controlled by miners, for the history of the mining industry cries out for worker ownership as the right alternative to a failed state monopoly. The Nottingham miners could first be offered control of their own enterprise. It should be made plain, however, that worker ownership is an alternative to conventional privatization and not to the discredited status quo.

correspondent for organizing

It is no surprise that European Community inspectors have found evidence of systematic cheating by Dutch fishermen in disregard of the catch quotas Holland is allotted under the common fisheries policy; or that the cheating is with the connivance of Dutch government officials. British fishermen have alleged as much for as long as the quotas have been in operation, and their allegation is against the fishermen of other member states also. British ministers have shared the suspicion but have not had the facts with which to frame a charge. Those facts are now reported to be available to the Commission and action is expected to follow in the European Court of Justice.

The British fishing industry is one of the sacrificial victims of successive governments' European policies. Accession to the Community entailed swallowing a common fisheries policy that had been cooked for the advan-tage of the fishermen of Six to the detriment of British fishermen. British waters, which were extended de facto from 12 miles to 200 miles from the shore in the course of the protracted negotiations, are fish-rich and comparatively well conserved. Instead of their remaining under national control and being used to compensate the industry for loss of distant fishing grounds. British waters became part of the Community fishpond.

The regime to which they have been subjected is built on the principle of equal access to all Community waters for the fishermen of all member states. Exclusive rights are recognized for narrow strips of coastal waters: for the rest the equal access principle is translated into national quotas within a total allowable catch fixed for each main species by reference to the requirements of conservation. The quotas are the subject of interminable haggling. They are bearable, as the best of a bad job from the British point of view, only on the basis of confidence that they are everywhere respected.

The enforcement of access and quotas is primarily the responsibility of each member government. There is also, on the wise insistence of the British Government, an inspectorate responsible to the Commission which has the duty of overseeing national enforcement. It is that everywhere.

inspectorate which has rumbled the Dutch and now proposes to extend its investigations in other directions. The inspectors' early catch - they have been in place for barely a year - promises well for their efficacy; though it still has to be seen if the Community's creaking machinery for adjudicating and deterring wrong-doing will work promptly and effectively.

It may be doubted if a strength of thirteen is adequate for the fish inspectorate, even before the hoped-for accession of Spain, which cats an inordinate amount of fish and has an underworked and technically proficient fishing fleet poised to sweep the Community's waters. The function of inspection is one of crucial importance, as much with milk quotas or olive oil as with fish. Producers and middlemen handling commodities subject to Community regulation are quick enough with corrupt abuse of the rules if they see an opening for enrichment - not all of them of course, but enough to inject anarchy into continental-wide arrangements whose chances of being observed anywhere depends on their being observed

use of English From Mr B. E Newton

Sir. My attention was drawn to your item (October 3) concerning HM Inspectors' consultative document. English from 5 to 16. The stress in the headline. "School inspectors want grammar at forefront in teaching English", and in the early part of your report provoked in me a weary despair that long-discredited methods of teaching English were about to be revived. When the document arrived on my desk the following day, I was ready to take the knife to it. I should have had more faith in the wisdom and experience of HMI. They want nothing of the kind. Indeed they assert unequivocally that "it has long been recognised that formal exercises in the analysis and classification of language contribute little or nothing to the ability to use it" (para. 3.8).

What her Majesty's Inspectorate is suggesting as indeed many enlightened English teachers have been doing for a long time. Is that if some attention is given to the examination and discussion of the structure of the language pupils speak, write, read, or listen to for real purposes, their awareness of its possibilities and airfelli too be absenced. In the course of pitalls can be sharpened. In the course of this, it is reasonable that they should learn such grammatical terminology as is useful to them for the discussion of Language (ogra 3.8)

Your correspondent appears to be seeking to create a conflict where none exists. The HMI document is a reasoned and helpful contribution to the discussion about aims, objectives and methods in teaching English. If it is read in conjunction with other recent HMI reports. notably the chapter on language in Aspects of Secondary Education in England (HMSO, 1979). it shows HMI to be concerned to promote a view of language development which gives equal status to talking. writing, reading and listening and stresses the importance of children using language for a wide variety of

'real or realistic" purposes. Far from being a reactionary document. English from 5 to 16 encourages a broader and more liberal understanding of the pur-poses of English teaching. It is well worth reading and reflecting upon. Yours faithfully

Harnessing the Severn

From Mr A. J. Ivins

Sir, Monetarists must be concerned that North Sea oil revenues be converted into new energy assets, so that this vital wealth should be preserved as a buttress of our future prosperity.
Since 1928 the feasibility of harnessing the tides to generate electricity in the Severn estuary has been recognised. Countless hours and money have been spent in investigation by scientific committees and no major disadvantage has been identified. It is estimated that the barrage could provide between 8 per cent to 10 per cent of the UK electricity needs and a reasonable life expectancy for the structure must be at least 200 years.

Then there is the road link to South Wales along the top of the barrage, maybe a rail link, the improved conditions for leisure industry (and private investment in this) and a site for a possible third London airport created by land reclamation using material dredged from the sea bed.

The cost would be £8bn over eight years with nearly all of this going to the UK economy. At least 60,000 direct new jobs would be created throughout the country, many unskilled, in the extraction, transport, shipping, engineering, electri-cal manufacturing, construction and construction support industries.

If tax clawback, insurance and pension contributions and the saving in unemployment and social security payments are discounted, it would amount to an investment by the Government of £500m per annum into the UK economy.

Set against similar payment for defence systems, frequently providing jobs in other countries, this pollution-free means of generating electricity, combined with the other features, makes a good national investment. Add the private investment it could generate and it is one single major step that would prime the pump of financial confidence. Yours faithfully.

From the Reverend Canon R. J. Halliburton Sir. The Christian voice in politics and in industrial relations should first and foremost be that of Christian lay people. The Church is not the clergy; it is the people of God in every part of our society.

Miners' special case

From Mr Francis McWilliams Sir. At last some sense is being injected into the pit closure negotiations. Of course management of the coalmines should be in the hands of the National Coal Board. Too often, in the past, this has appeared to be in the hands of the NUM.

Of course the National Coal Board should say which collieries should be closed on economic grounds. They are, however, not the people to decide whether, because of a number of other reasons, a particular colliery should be kept

That mines and mining communities are a special case recognized by most people. If this was not the case the extremely generous redundancy arrangements have caused considerable outery. The method of effecting the closure of collieries should also be effected in a special way.

An outline procedure could be that the National Coal Board would be required to give warning of a pit closure at least three years in advance. An inquiry would then he held, either by a single independent arbitrator or by a panel of such arbitrators. At such an inquiry the Coal Board would put its case and other interested parties, such as the NUM, local authorities, local trade associations, etc would make their representations. The arbitrator would then make his report and recommendations to the Secretary of State for Energy.

who would then have to decide whether or not the taxpayer (not the National Coal Board) should be asked to bear the burden of keeping such a colliery open and for how long.

Obviously, such inquiries would take time and cost money and, given the form of argument at present apparently favoured by the NUM. could be liable to disruption.

Where an inquiry could not be held because of disruption a colliery would close in any case at the end of the period of notice. The gain from disruption would therefore be minimal It would be necessary for arbitraiors to have some degree of technical expertise but here. I am sure the Chartered Institute of Arbitrators would be happy to assist (as a fellow of the institute I must declare an interest). One of the great advantage of the system would be that it would make the Coal Board concentrate its collective mind and so avoid the farce of men being transferred to a colliery which is then closed almost immediately. It would put an end to the semantic arguments in which Mr Scargill appears to delight. It might also bring out imaginative ways of prolonging the life of collieries as co-operatives with local support. Inquiries are held before a small footpath or road is closed. Surely it is not unreasonable that inquiries should be beld before whole communities are closed? FRANCIS MCWILLIAMS. 212 Gilbert House,

Union register's limits From Mr Peter Thurnham, MP for

Bolton North-East (Conservative) Sir. Is Woodraw Wyatt right to believe that trade union leaders will behave sufficiently democratically with the enactment of the 1984 Acr? (feature, September 22).

He compares the election of union leaders to the election of boards of directors by their shareholders. But the crucial difference is that the 1984 Act does not call for the new register of union members' names and addresses to be open to the public. The register is to be closed, known only to the union leaders and to the certification officer - unlike the register of shareholders in a limited liability company, which must be open to the public. It is as if the ciectoral register itself was available only to the ruling party. What sort of democracy would that be?

What we really want to hear from our Church leaders are statements which jog the conscience of the nation. Fruits and vegetables are the main attraction at the Royal Horticultural Society's Flower Show, which opened vesterday in Westminster with the humble potato creating a great deal of interest.
Indeed, there is a quiet revolution taking place so far as this vegetable is concerned, as demonstrated by the exhibit of potatoes grown from seeds, staged by the RHS Garden, Wisley. Seeds were sown in April 1983, and the tubers planted in spring this year. The advantages of growing potatoes from seeds are that they are free from viruses and cheaper to buy than tubers. In the not too distant future this could be the normal method of growing potatoes in private gardens and

Lion Intoximeter properly approved

Queen's Bench Division Hayward v Eames Kirkpatrick v Harrigan

Before Lord Lane, Lord Chief Justice, Mr Justice Stuart-Smith and Mr Justice Leggati

[Judgment delivered October 9] The Lion Intoximeter 3000 is a device of a type approved by the Secretary of State for analysing motorists breath within section 8(1) (a) of the Road Traffic Act 1972 as substituted by section 25 of, and Schedule 8 to, the Transport Act 1981

The Queen's Bench Divisional The Queen's Bench Divisional Court unanimously so held when dismissing an appeal by way of case stated by Revel Henry Hayward, who had been convicted of an offence of driving with excess breath alcohol by Kent Justices sitting at Chatthan and allowing a passed by Chatham and allowing an appeal by Police Sergeant David Kirkpatrick against the dismissal by the Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate (Miss 4, M. Jennings) sitting at Wells Street of an information with having failed to provide a breath specimen for analysis contrary to section 8(7) of the 1972

The cases were called on together and the arguments of both motorists were presented before those of the prosecutors. Applications by counsel for the motorists for certificates enabling an appeal to be made to the House of Lords were refused. Mr Peter Archer, QC and Mr Graham Lyons for Mr Hayward; Mr W. H. Dunn. The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said that the question to be decided in each case was the same, namely, whether the breath analysis machine whether the breath analysis machine known as the Lion Intoxemeter 3000 was a device which had been properly approved by the Secretary of State or not. If not, no evidence emanating from it was admissible and the justices at Chatham were wrong to convict. If the device was properly so approved the Row properly so approved the Bow Street Magistrate was wrong in ruling the evidence inadmissible. The precise facts in each case were

The revelant words in section 8(1)(2) were that a constable in the course of investigating whether a person had committed an offence might require him to provide two specimens of breath for analysis by means of a device of a type approved by the Secretary of State". By section 10(3) evidence of breath-alcohol proportion might be given by production of a document automatically by the device.

Approval by the Secretary of State of the type of machine was essential to the whole process of its use to provide guilt in cases of driving after consuming so much alcohol that the proportion in the motorist's breath exceeded the prescribed limit of 35 microgrammes of alcohol in 100 milli-

One argument was that the statute nowhere empowered the Secretary of State to approve the device and there could, therefore, be device and there could, therefore, be no approval. The arguments no approval. The arguments advanced for the motorist were

The terms of section 8(1) plainly implied that the Secretary of State had both the power and the duty to approve such type of device as he should think fit.

A similar provision was included in the Road Safety Act 1967 and, with one exception, no one seemed to have thought it deficient. The exception was R r Clarke [[1969] 2 QB 911 where similar arguments had been advantable. had been advanced to the court; there counsel, after argument, had conceded the point to be a bad one concession applauded by the The wording of section 8 stated plainly and unambiguously that a device approved by the Secretary of State might be used for gauging the proportion of alcohol in the subject's breath. The Lion Intoximeter 3000 was so approved. The fact that the approval was given before the coming into force of that part of the Act did not mean that the approval was any the less effective.

The prosecutor's appeal was allowed and the case remitted for the hearing to continue. The motorist's appeal was dismissed. The costs of the prosecutors were ordered to be paid out of central funds and legal aid taxations were

THE ARTS

Peter Schaufuss brings such vigour and initiative to his new job directing London Festival Ballet as to present a real challenge, in terms of dancing as well as repertory, to the primacy of the Royal Ballet itself: John Percival investigates his plans and prospects

Appealing entertainment for a growing audience

Peter Schaufuss's appointment as director of London Festival Ballet, from the start of the new season, could completely change the balance of British ballet. He arrives, aged 35 and bursting with ideas, at a time when the other large London-based dance companies are all showing signs of artistic stagnation. There is no way that Festival Ballet can supplant the Royal Ballet, but it could offer an alternative that appeals to an increasing proportion of the dance

It did that once, under its founders Anton Dolin and Julian Braunsweg and their first successors, but since 1968 it has been run by Royal Ballet alumni. Although the company kept its momentum under Beryl Grey, it came to compete more on the Royal Ballet's own ground, a process that accelerated after John Field took over. Inevitably, that made Festival risk looking like a poor copy instead of an independent alternative.

Schaufuss, whose first comment on being offered the job was "fortunately, I like solving problems", plans to change that. An incoming director inherits commitments made by his predecessor, in this instance a new production of Coppelia to be staged next spring by Ronald Hynd, That was expected more or less to exhaust the production budget for the whole season. Schaufuss has managed to agree with his chairman (Sir Ian Hunter, also new this year) and finance director, Peter Morris, economics in other expenditure that enable him to add several works to the repertory without delay.

The choice shows what can be expected from the Schaufuss regime. Night Creatures, to be premièred on tour in Novem-ber, is the first work in any British repertory by Alvin Alley, who puts a healthy dash of Broadway theatricality into his dances; this particular example is generally reckoned one of the most successful of his series to Duke Ellington music.

That will be followed in the new year by Roland Petit's Carmen, which has proved so consistent a hit for any company able to find a good cast that it is amazing that no British director ever obtained it before now. The first new creation, due next summer, will be by Christopher Bruce, one of the lew young British chorcographers with a flair for drama in dance. Afterwards, Schaufuss has what he describes as a long list of choreographers he wants to invite so as to give the dancers wide experience; they include several whose work is unknown in Britain, as well as one of the brightest of local newcomers.

Even more startling, if it comes off, is Schaufuss's hope of presenting Ashton's Romeo and Juliet next summer. It has never been given in London, because Ashion, who staged it in Copenhagen before seeing any other version, feared his delicate effects would be killed by comparison bolder treatments. Whether Schaufuss (whose mother was Ashton's first Juliet) has really succeeded in overcoming those anxieties we shall see, but he says so, and even the attempt shows initiative.

Compare that programme with what the Royal Ballet has lined up for the season. Each of its companies is to have a new production of one of the Tchaikovsky ballets - The Sleeping Beauty on tour, The Nutcracker at Covent Garden. The former will obviously be useful; the latter will need to be exceptionally good to justify its place in the schedules. Both have been entrusted to the same producer, Peter Wright, on top of his other heavy commitments, which seems odd programming.

Kenneth MacMillan, the principal choreographer, is taking a sabbatical year but will be busy in New York with one of the Royal Ballet's international competitors. David Bintley, listed (but only in the small print at the back of the programmes why so coy about their best talent?) as company choreographer at Sadler's Wells, is to make one new work there and one at Covent Garden: a reasonable quota, given that he is also commissioned for a new work in Paris. What seems less reasonable is the paucity of performances for his existing ballets. John Cranko. at Bintley's age, was given a much bigger share of performances and still left for lack of opportunities.

Apart from that, and a new duet by André Prokovsky, the Royal Ballet's premières are to be by apprentice choreographers. Jennifer Jackson and Wayne Eagling, and by Michael Corder who though more experienced, does not exactly have much international standing. It all ties in with the policies at Ballet Rambert and London Contemporary Dance Theatre, who are also apparently unable or unwilling to subject their dancers to external influences, but go cosily on with a tiny group of resident choreographers, among whom only Richard Alston does much to extend the dancers beyond what comes most

That is one reason why Rambert and London Contemporary often look dull in comparison with more enterprising small groups, Second Stride or Michael Clark's company. with Janet Smith's company and Extemporary Dance Theatre also making a bid for attention by their choice of repertory. The Royal Ballet ought, in theory, to be better able to avoid the worst effects of any disappointment in their new productions by the strength of their back list, but this year's selection is more notable for what is not included.

It goes without saying, by now, that there is nothing by Antony Tudor (we shall have to go to Paris to see anything by that great English choreographer this year). There is also nothing by de Valois, or Masssine, or Nijinska; not much Cranko, Fokine or Balanchine. Each of the Royal Rallet companies this season is due to Ballet companies this season is due to dance only one ballet by a living foreign choreographer. Van Manen's 5 Tangos at the Wells, Kylian's Strange Land at the Garden.

One consolation is that, thanks to Ashton's eightieth birthday, his ballets will be slightly more prominent than in some recent seasons, but hardly to the extent justified by his talent, and all drawn from a very incomplete sampling of the works that ought to be preserved if history is not to condemn the Royal Ballet's guardians as irresponsible and short-sighted.

A batch of promotions - Bryony Brind, Fiona Chadwick, Alessandra Ferri and Ashley Page - brings some new life to the mainly rather elderly line-up of principal dancers at Covent Garden, but one cannot help wonder-ing whether Anthony Dowell's appointment as assistant to the director heralds less frequent appearances by him, and David Wall's early retirement has already left the male ranks dangerously exposed if anything like last season's run of injuries should recur, as could happen if there is anything in the theory that excessively acrobatic demands by some choreographers are partly to blame for distorting dancers' physiques and weakening them.

In respect of dancing as well as epertory. Peter Schaufuss at Festival Ballet could present a real challenge to the Royal Ballet. He has already recruited two outstanding young men to fill vacancies at principal dancer level, Patrick Armand from France and Raffaele Paganini from Italy. He hopes to get the former Bolshoi soloist Vladimir Derevianko as a full-time member too.

With that aggressive recruitment policy (and others are already lined up for next year) goes a determination to make the most of the talent within the company. As a first step, he has been working with the ballet staff to establish a company style that reflects his own international experience. In the longer term, he would like a school attached to the company to break the near-monopoly of the Royal Ballet School. That could do nothing but good.

In effect. Schauluss's attitude is much like the policy on which Dolin originally based Festival Ballet: that standards must be the highest attainable, and that the purpose of ballet is to entertain an audience, not just feed creative egos. His individual voice is a refreshing change after the compromises and committee jargon that have fogged British ballet lately. Companies other than Festival could find themselves forced into a similar consideration of what they really want to achieve.

One such was the commentary on the corpse of a victim of heroin when one wished the subject of it were less obtrusive; another the examination of the unlawful killing of the actor Peter Arne.

In the first, foul play was eliminated, for the laboratory not only confirms crime but also rules it out; in the second the link between Mr Arne's death and the suicide of a man whose body was recovered later. from the Thames was indicated without being pronounced egally conclusive.

Thames's A Shred of Evidence accumulated expertise has puters, electron microscopes information from less and less material. We were shown how a hit-and-run driver was traced from particles of glass in a road and speeks of paint, how a series of rapes were linked and the perpetrator convicted, how a hank draft was proved to have been altered from £60 to £60,000.

Dr Jain West described the Libyan Information Bureau shooting and we learnt how meticulous work had established that two Sterling submachine guns had been used and their firing positions located. Dr West added the sad footnote on how WPC Fletcher had been standing when she was shot: turning slightly with her arms peaceably folded.

The laboratory investigates three per cent of known crimes in the capital. One-fifth of its staff have suffered from cutbacks and, we were told, an increase of one per cent in its already prodigious workload would make it impossible to cope, which made one wonder about the priority of that law and order we hear so much

On Your Toes

Palace Theatre Musically, the best number in

On Your Toes is probably "Glad to be unhappy", the brave, sad ballad that Siobhan McCarthy sings as Frankie when Junior has stood her up to have lunch with Vera Baronova. Uniquely in this show it has no dance, almost no business; she just sits or stands, and sings. That shows what Rodgers and Hart could do through words and music alone. But of course the reason why this particular show of theirs is back on the boards is that it is the one in which George Balanchine introduced Broadway to the word choreography.

Only the final Slaughter on Tenth Arenue ballet of his survives, and that in a version he made in the Sixties, but he also advised Peter Martins on the Princess Zenohia ballet make equal impact. which ends the first half, so the Balanchine flair adds the finishing stroke to both halves. In both of them, the London production has now notched up inira (who originally shared the role a difficult act to follow: she is impossible, in a role that might have been written as a prescient caricature, years before her birth, of her accent and personality. Panova has the accent, and the strongest technique: Wells has the personality and the best legs (quite a factor in this part). Both of them play the role with relish and look marvellous in Zack Brown's gorgeous costumes.

Natalia Makarova is not just

With no disprespect to either of them, it has to be said that Tim Flavin, who gave even Makarova a run for her money, now emerges as the star of Slaughter on Tenth Avenue, not only for the hilarious series of increasingly desperate reprises with which he tries to stave off assassination, but also because he plays his role of a seedy, sinister hoofer with an intensity that lets Balanchine's sly jokes and his voluptuous pas de deux

Patricia Merrin, the new leader of Donald Saddler's ballet to the title number of On Your Toes, gives it an extra zip that enhances the effect of Richard Rodgers's theme and Hans Spialek's overwhelming

Rudolf Serkin, into his eightics, is not an old man. I refuse to believe it. Old men do not walk with his sprightly upright gait. nor bound up the steps to the platform to receive applause with such impish delight. Nor, one would have thought, do they play Mozart with the kind of spontaneity with which Mr Scrkin gave the E flat Piano Concerto, K482, in the final concert of the London Symphony Orchestra's Shellsponsored national tour.

But he is no youngster either. Every note he played spoke of a lifetime's experience, the kind that tells you that each performance has the scope to reveal new insights, and in his case undoubtedly will.

That sound is dry, even brittle. and one used to a smoother modern touch might have slightly regretted the hint of stiffness found in the occasional semiquaver run. Evelyn Glennie (the winner) and Christopher Thomas hail from Scotland and Wales, and so received their awards in appropriate cities earlier in the tour. They, and their fellow percussionists Andrew Barclay. Derek Gleeson. Rachel Gledhill and Simon Carrington, will be heard from again, Ì am sure.

Tannhäuser Covent Garden

Half the problem with Tannhauser, after all, is Tannhauser. and, in a production which still scarcely knows quite what to make of him. Spas Wenkoff, who has just taken over from Klaus König in Elijah Moshinsky's new staging; does a fair enough job.
As Paul Griffiths remarked of this production when it opened. it takes us to the edge of the world: the trouble is that it is far from sure what it should be finding there. It is hardly Mr stricted: he sings primarily to Wenkoff's fault then it, in Sir Colin Davis and the pit,

He comes into his element in the self-tormenting frenzy of the last act in which his tight. sinewy baritonic tenor can squeeze out the inner agony effectively enough. In the first two acts, though, neither voice nor production is able to extolling of Venus, for instance, throw its protagonist, is vocally and physically con-little to warm his elation.

Mr Wenkoff's engaging, wide fluoride grin serves him well in the expression of derangement. But the manic leer, the restless shifting from foot to foot during Wolfram's aria and the tottering histrionics surely betoken an unease outside as much as inside his role. It is this central Wartburg act, indeed, which reveals most forcibly how a production apparently uncongenerate sufficient dramatic vinced at its core by the work's momentum to support it. Millions moved by BT's irresistible offer wider share ownership, the Government is doing its best to make the British Telecom issue into an offer which private investors cannot refuse. The carrot dangled in front of small investors are temptingly large.

Buyers can choose either to receive vouchers to pay phone bills, or share bonuses. The vouchers, worth £18 each. are available 18 months after the share sale, up to a maximum of 12, depending on the size of the shareholding. Only one voucher can be used with each quarterly telephone bill but all are valid for 10 months. Their worth, strictly speaking. cannot be included in the yield the shares offer, since the vouchers eventually run out. Kleinwort, Benson, the merchant banker involved, calculated that while the vouchers last, they are worth an annualized return of 10 per cent gross (seven per cent after tax) on top of the conventionally calculated dividend yield.

Alternatively, investors of £5,000 in BT shares or more can choose the share bonus; an extra share for every 10 shares they hold. The only snag is that this "exira" comes after three years, not immediately. The ploy has been used once before - with the ill-fated Britoil share

Both vouchers and bonus shares are free of income tax. This is specially good for higher rate taxpayers. The bonus shares issued after the three years will be valued at the then market value, not the original launch price. So, if the price has risen, any capital gains tax liability on them is reduced

Are these carrots having the desired effect? BT has been monitoring the public's response to the promotional campaign, with the help of MORI. So far, of Britain's adult population 78 per cent is aware that BT is being privatized. More surprizingly perhaps, 25 per cent - around 12 million people - are seriously thinking of buying £250 worth or more of BT shares. The number of private shareholders is 1.8 million. How many of the 12 million actually do buy in the end is anyone's guess, but we might be about to witness the biggest single leap towards people's capitalism history has yet seen.

The disappearing BSA rate

The Building Societies Association meeting on Friday could witness the death of the BSA's ailing "recommended" mortgage and investment rates. Since the latest outbreak of fierce competition between societies the old cartel's most visible devize no longer serves any useful purpose. It was completely ignored by almost all societies on the last two occasions when mortgage and investment rates went shooting up. Recognizing that it had become a dead letter, the Department of Employment no longer uses the BSA rate in its Retail Price Index calculations.

The societies are just beginning to appreciate the implications of what is happening. To raise rates competitively is easy; to lower them without some sort of co-ordination is much harder, because the first society to put its investment rates down inevitably loses valuable deposits. This understanding could eventually lead to the reintroduction of some sort of informal agreement between societies over rate movements, but so far there is no sign of it. In the meantime, as many building society managers now recognise, whatever the Halifax does takes on even greater importance than before as a signal to smaller societies.

For the industry as a whole the Halifax, currently, is not sufficiently representative of the market to "fix" the pattern of rates. Its mortgage rates are low, starting at 12.75 per cent, while its investment rates are as high as other societies.'. The Halifax's comment that it might consider reducing its investment, but not mortgage, rates if base rates fell was essentially a thought directed to improving its own profit margins.

Base rate cut not long delayed

Disappointing money figures - a rise of up to 11/2 per cent in Sterling M3 in the five weeks to mid-September - have presumably dashed a Conservative Party conference cut in bank base rates. No harm in that. Whatever the moentary justification, a cut just this week would have provoked allegations that the Government was playing cynical politics; that its nerve had been broken by unemployment figures and it was ready to do anything quick and casy to boost the economy. Such speculation would have weakened the Chancellor's hand in his struggle with colleagues in the annual spending round, whish looks set to be an exceptionally tough one.

As noted here yesterday, the latest schack could lead to a steeper fall in interest rates in a few weeks. Although the September figures take the growth in Sterling M3 to the very top of the Government's target range of 6-10 per cent (and raise the growth of "little Mo", which has been encouragingly low, to 51/2 per cent), they bode well for the futur. The figurs are swollen by a statistical oddity in the interbank item; and by a certain amount of round tripping, estimated to have added between £250m and £750m to the figures.

The first is unlikely to be repeated, the second is likely to unwind in later months. helping to bring the monetary growth rate down sharply. Although public borrowing was disappointinly high, this too should fall pretty sharply; the markets are already coming to appreciate the Bank of England's considerable funding success during the first half of a difficult year.

So three-month inter-bank rates, now clevated to considerable importance on the money instrument panel, rose only a little on publication of the money figures. They were too high to justify a cut in base rates; but suggested that the moment of renewed confidence may not be long delayed. It will be stronger without the complications of Brighton propaganda.

Grosvenor profits soar to £1.1m

Grosvenor Group, the old Wellco Holdings transformed over the last two and a half years by Mr Gordon Hazzard into a mini-electricals conglom-crate, yesterday announced almost doubled profits for the year to June 3.

Pretax profits rose from £573,000 to £1.1m and a final dividend of 3.5p, lifting the total from 5.25p to 5.75p, is being recommended. The results take in a £500,000 loss at Cera, the group's industrial cleaning equipment offshoot. Cera's management has now been changed and the group expects losses there to be substantially reduced this year.

Further acquisitions are planned and the group is giving serious consideration to the possibility of floating some of its subsidiaries on the Unlisted Securities Market.

Predators stalk round Dixons-Currys battle

Reactions yesterday to the Dixons-Currys bid from other retailers, like Sears and Harris Queensway, showed just what a heavy pebble had been tossed into the retailing pool. Yes, commented Sears, Dixons-Currys would fit neatly into the group, adding swiftly that Sears' interest was on a par with its perennial scrutiny of Harrods - only if the price was right. Harris Queensway revealed that, like Currys, it had retained the services of Fitch and Co to advise on how best to brighten up the stores. But it had no bid plans. Both Harris and Sears are agreed that consumer confidence had taken a severe knock during the miners' strike in the summer. But now spending was picking up fast, a point endorsed by yesterday's heavy bank lending figures. Spending has seen a sharp lift in September, and this Christmas suddenly threatens to be good. In more detail, Sears reckons that the miners' strike may have cost some £2m in lost profits, and distinguishes very clearly between an affluent South and a depressed North; a £2m drop in footwear retailing profits paints a picture of real

Nevertheless, there is some-thing faintly unbelievable about a group with sufficient expertise to add an extra £2m to pretax profits (after last year's 70 per cent gain) which relies on bad weather to boost its betting results. Plainly, the group is itching to negotiate a big US deal presumably involving shoc retailing, but has failed so far to find the ideal match. A 14 per cent rise in the interim dividend did not save the shares from a 5p fall to 79½p.

The Harris Queensway story is closer to home. The group claims to detect a real switch in consumer spending preferences away from brown goods and into furniture and carpets, which theoretically should jolt Dixon's optimism.

So too, on a longer term view, could the group's plans to build a 60-strong edge-of-town brown and white goods retailing chain called Ultimate. Harris stressed that there is still plenty of turnover in the but the store build-up could take five years.

dramatic but Christies is still doing well.

The company is also getting But the move is related to the current logic of retailing which gravitates towards the urban periphery. Hence it highlights the long-term competitive pressures on both Currys and Dixons whatever the bid

Over at the Dixons annual meeting, the talk was still of buoyant brown goods turnover in contrast with the Harris experience. Behind the rhetoric, talk of negotiated recommendations could imply olive branches between the parties. Are the merchant banks taking a leaf out of Acas's book?

Christies Int

Forecasting profits for Christies International is as difficult as predicting what price a Pre-Raphaelite picture from the early years of the movement will fetch in a sale. In the final analysis the two figures are inextricably linked since the more people are prepared to pay for their own slice of the fine art world the more Christies takes by way of commission. Judging by yesterday's in-terim pretax profits of £7.7m up by more than £3.5m, art lovers are not suffering from any shortage of funds although the improvement is more to do with the market increasing than higher prices.

The results are certainly flattered by the strength of the dollar. The American operations now generate more income than the combined British and European activities. Even in dollar terms though the New York showrooms have shown substantial improvements and their progress has been a key feature of hristies recent histories. The New York showroom was opened only seven years ago and in that time it has eaten steadily into Sotheby's share of a very lucrative market. The company estimates that it now achieves sales equivalent to 80 per cent of its main competitor's. In Britain and Europe, the capture of market share has not been so

The company is also getting more than its fair share of the big prestigious sales which bring much better operating margins. In the second half Christies balance sheet will enjoy the benefit of the £21m sale of the Chatsworth drawings which could add £1.5m to profits.

In the full year the company could make anything up to £16m but after that it is anyone's guess. There could be a slowdown in profits growth next year which leaves the shares, up 8p at 451p, fairly valued in the short term.

Bowthorpe Holdings

Bowthorpe Holdings, happy to describe uself as possibly the smallest multinational com-pany in Britain, has lost none of its expertise in finding niches in other people's industries for its electrical and electronic products.

Its ability to supply low technology parts for other companies high technology products in the right sort of industries - like defence both in Britain and overseas helped it turn in record interim results with prospects of profits of £20m or more for the full

The big improvement stems from the substantial increase in sales, especially from overseas and from the United States in particular: Sales and profits are now divided almost equally hetween Britain and overseas. The US accounts for about one-fifth of sales.

Two-fifths of British sales are to the Ministry of Defence and include things like the mundane but essential multiconnectors which link avionics in aircraft such as the Harrier and Tornado.

Interest received has risen trongly from £335,000 to £1.8m but the figures include a one-off capital gain from funds repatriated from Jersey after the Chancellor's scrapping of roll-up funds. There is nothing quite like Bowthorpe and the shares offer an unusual route into some interesting industries. But the already well up with events.

ECONOMIC COMMENTARY

At odds over the key to Keynes

By Tim Congdon

There are intriguing parallels between the economic situation in 1933 and today. And the same issues still trouble Keynesians

Monetarism and deflation have companies to rebuild working been synonymous since the term "monetarism" was invented in the 1960s. The two acceptable words "monetary control" have been taken as a smokescreen for the unacceptable words "more unemployment".

The associations are not surprising. In the last 15 years governments have used monetary policy almost exclusively as a means of curbing inflation, and there has rarely been any suggestion that it could have other ends. If monetarism and deflation have been regarded as twins, so also have fiscalism and reflation. In public debate, supporters of active fiscal policies have invariably been supporters of fiscal policies to stimulate demand and promote employ-

There is, however, nothing necessary and inevitable about these connexions. It is quite possible to prefer monetary to fiscal instruments in economic management and yet to believe that the overall direction of policy should be stimulatory. An economist who favours fiscal weaponry, in some circumstances, could also want the budget deficit reduced to check inflationary pressures.

Fiscalism and reflation are also commonly linked to Keynes and Keynesianism. This is also questionable. For most of his career Keynes' policy priority was more expansionary monetary policy through a reduction in interest rates, not public works and an increased budget deficit. He put monetary policy first and fiscal policy

Perhaps the best example of this attitude are four articles he wrote for The Times on "The emphasis on monetary policy Means to Prosperity" in March, was neglected, then forgotten.

the 1930s and 1960s Keynesian textbook writers referred confidently to the interest-inelasticity of investment (the supposed unresponsiveness of investment to interest rate changes) as a way of dismissing monetary policy.

As monetarism was about to gain hold in the late 1960s, the Keynesians had performed a complete intellectual somersault from Keynes' own position in 1933. They rejected lower interest rates as a technique of reflation. Instead they thought that fiscal policy was the only efficient method of regulating demand.

Their set of policy recommendations and preferences had a large, if not altogether explicit, ideological element. Active fiscal policy was approved in theory because it was good for the management of the economy. In practice it also came to mean more public expenditure and increased public sector employment - including the employment of benign, disinterested and Keynesian economic advisers.

Active monetary policy was disliked because interest rates were deemed ineffective as an influence on aggregate demand. It was perhaps not entirely incidental that lower interest rates would have been of no benefit to bureaucrats and academic economists (then and emphasis on monetary policy now predominantly Keynesian was neglected, then forgotten in affiliation), but of great and entrepreneurs.

The Keynesians were successone important and quite undemonetary policy grounds Britain was on a fixed exchange for any general increase in rate and the risk of devaluation gave the Keynesians a prefext for opposing low interest rates "on external grounds".

> This also was a total inversion of Keynes' own beliefs. A continuous theme throughout his career was that Britain must relate interest rate policy todomestic economic ditions and not allow it to be swayed by the frequently eccentric behaviour of foreign

Keynes stated this point with strong emphasis in a speech to the House of Lords in 1943. To quote, the Government must abjure the instruments of bank rate and credit contraction operating through the increase of unemployment as a means of forcing our domestic economy into line with external factors". The relative power of monetary and fiscal weapons, and the weight to be attached to external factors, remains funda-mental to understanding policy discussions today. They are vital considerations in any debate on what should be done about high and rising unem-

interestingly, there are hints of a divergence of opinion between the Treasury and the Bank of England. The differences seem to stem from conflicting views about the economy's responsiveness to interest rate changes, precisely the issue which so troubled Keynes and the Keynesians.

The Treasury's attitude is that interest rates are too high on domestic grounds and ought to be reduced. The latest version of its econometric model suggests that some components of aggregate de-mand, notably housing and consumer expenditure, are intcrest-rate-sensitive. Lower interest rates would therefore be beneficial for the economy and unemployment

The Treasury has, in effect, adopted Keynes' position in 1933, but without his advocacy potential value to businessmen of higher public sector investment. By contrast, the Bank of changing perspective. The Keynesians were successful in public debate until the carly 1970s. They were lucky in England in its latest Economic Bulletin seems to incline towards the views of the postwar Keynesians. The last two paragraphs of the Bulletin's "General Assessment" are the important ones. The future role of consumption in sustaining the recovery is pooh-poohed. The Bank claims that "it is unlikely, with the saving ratio now close to 10 per cent, that private consumption will lead the rise in activity".

This assertion appears withrates and, as such, implicitly challenges the Treasury pos-ition. The last sentence in the final paragraph is even more subversive: "In the months ahead, market sentiment is likely to be more sensitive to industrial developments, and financial developments in the United States, than to domestic monetary factors". The sentence needs a little translation. "Market senti-ment" really stands for "interest rates" and "industrial developments" for "the miners' strike" The message is that interest rates should be governed by external factors ("financial developments in the United States") and the degree of trade union belligerence.

This is unreconstructed 1960s-style Keynesianism. It is clearly at odds with several statements from both the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer which indicate that interest rates should belower because domestic monetary trends are satisfactory.

Of course, it is refreshing healthy and desirable that policy debates are conducted within the government ma-chine, although on this occasion they could pehaps have been more discreet.

It will be a nice irony if, in the months ahead, the monetarists in the Treasury press for lower interest rates because they are worried about unemployment whereas the Kenynesians in the Bank of England urge that interest rates stay high because they are worried about the

Taken from any viewpoint, Frank Sawyer was a remarkable man. He came from a family of six, had little

The enigma is at least partially resolved in a new book by a friend of Sawyer's. Sidney Vines, Man of the Riverside (Allen and Unwin, 29,95 hardback). Half of the book is a collection of Sawyer's unpublished writings about his boyhood.

The other half contains extracts front Sawyer's published works, together with assessments of Sawyer

Major Viges links all this with comments of his own — a difficult format compared with the straight biography which ought to be written — but it does further our knowledge of this complex yet simple man.

What comes over clearly is Sawyer's passionate devotion to the river which eventually became his charge, his stubbern persistence, his sensitivity, his more than usual ability to study and observe. He was one of those rare creatures: a born

It is a pity that apart from some charming line drawings, the book contains no photographs of Sawyer at all. People would really like to know what this remarkable man looked like. His face was extraordinorth title. His face was extraordi-marily expressive. Very and.
On the whole, however, Major Vines and his publishers have served Sawyer well, which cannot be said of the new paperback of Sawyer's Nymphs and the Troot, (Adam and Charles Black, 25.95) paperback).

(Adam and Charles Black, £6.95 paperback).

The photoprinting is of meeven quality, the out-of-date line and book numbers are lacking an explanation, so that modern readers will not know what size of hooks or weight of lines Sawyer tiped, and to add insult to injury, to these who knew of their aningonism, the photograph on the front cover is not of Sawyer, but of Ofiver Kitz.

Omission of Hill may not please England

Richard Hill, England's current sional selectors, who vesterday named their team to play the Australians at Exeter on October 20. The Bristol half backs, Harding and Barnes, have been picked as a successful club pairing, the strength of their case being allied to the selection at No 8 of Hesford, their championship calendar is not surprising bearing in mind the long-running argument between FISA and the Monaco Autoclub colleague, whose understanding with Harding is an important feature of Bristol's success. British eyes will be opened if Wallabies play to their name

The cause of rugby will be advanced materially should the Wallabies, who left Australia for Britain yesterday, have a successful tour over the next two months. By successful i do not mean unbeaten. Of their 18 games the Wallabigs have few soft ones. Whoever formed an itinerary containing consecutive matches in eight days against England, Midlands and Ireland

England. Middands and irreand must have been comparing notes with the New Zealand schemers who designed the 1983 British Lions itinerary.

The Australians have much to offer. They have a good spread of height and weight and speed among their forwards best of all, they have, at least among their senior players. at least among their senior players, an exciting backline, provided they

There's the rub. At their best, allaby backs can produce an uninhibited irreverence makes nonsense of the cautious course of modern back play. I have course of modern back pist. Ella as half-backs, Hawker and Slack in midfield. Moon and Campese on the wings and Gould at full-back may be a more potent scoring unit than even France can manage. The man even France can manage. The French may possess more subtle flair, but I wonder whether Codorniou. Sella and company would have the hard-headed discipline, of the Wallaby backs laying at the peak of their arrogant

Yet the great disappointment of a rather tawdry Wallaby-All Black series on the dry, fast fields of Australia in July and August was that the Wallaby backs were inhibited, that they had no recognizable battle-plan and that they stattered about like nervous novices. They discarded their birthright and took upon themselves a muddling mess of tactical ktcking a muddling mess of tactical kicking designed not to put the ball into the hands of such explosive curities as

These factics were sufficient to out point an uncertain, unready All Black side in the first international. Within 15 minutes of the start of the second international the Wallabies drawing on Ella's magic, were 12-0 ahead. They had glory, and the rubber, within easy reach - and they choked. Their backs kicked and they allowed a useful All Black pack, and Visa problem delays prop forward

Commission in Camberra eventually gave the necessary authorization.

Rodriguez arrived back at the airport just in time to see his plane take off. He is now booked on a flight to London today and should therefore be available for the team's first pane against London at Twickenham on October 17.

Particles and 22 will translet Rodriguez, aged 32, still travels on an Argentine passport even though he has settled in Sydney with his Emily.

Yer these were the backs who, in 1982 and a few hours before the (again 1-1 in the series), had planned that the first piece of useful out passes and a try in the corner. Which they did.

Why the change from confident arrogance in 1982 to confused diffuence in 1984. One reason must be that the team had not regained poise or direction after the sanguinary revolution early this year which removed that innovative and put in Alan Jones, an champions, a singular motivator.

Jones is interesting to listen to. In one of his fruitier momens he ope of ms install as the Gheagis Khan of Australian rugby as, he said, Ghengis had been one of the great conservatives of history. He may be a motivator, whatever that sufficeent about the nuts and bolts

Before the third international and amid Australia's continual problem of finding a consistent goal kicker. Jones said he had had a long discussion with Gould, who had shied away from kicking duties in the first and second internationals, Gould, Jones said, had been made aware of his responsibilities; he would be the lead-off backer Gould made a diffident hash of the first two attempts, which had a strong impact on the course of the game, and Ella took over again.

So there must be the question whether Jones, for all his literate larynx, can persuade himself and his players that they should do what they do best - play like Australians.

If will be important, too, that Innes persuades his Wallabies to adjust to the static nature of British rugby, a cause for, or the result of, what is regarded in southern parts as the over-technical northern hemithe over-technical normern healt-sphere refereing. The All Blacks and the Wallabies did not react well to the precise refereing of Roger Quittention and David Burnett during the international series, although Jones did indulge in some precise property designed to make press-agentry designed to ma Burnett aware of what Jon regarded as All Black skulduggery

If the Wallabies are flexible enough to form their own distinc-tive pattern of play around the British playing and refereing styles, they will be interesting and easy to watch. They have the basis of a watch. They have the basis of a strong international pack, helped not a little by the rapid introduction of Enrique Rodriguez, the squat, powerful former Argentine prop, who has put a poish on Australian scrum technique. They have a beaupole in the 6ft Sin Steve Cutler, whom the All Blacks found a mussure at the inequal. unsance at the uncoul.

Even from this distance it is possible to suggest that in some parts of Britain rugby is forward-orientated and penalty goal-ridden to the point of stognation. Should the Australians.

their backs, play to their birthright, to their unage of slightly wild colonial boys, they might open a few-British eyes to the old truths that the best rugby is based on the sample arts of speed of hand and foot, speed of passing and backing-up and particularly of the fluid flow away from the heaving forward pile-up and into the wide open spaces beyond.

Tour route should suit Kelly

Although the 1984 season does not end until this weekend, the talk here yesterday was all about next year's Tour de France. At an overthrow from the Champs Elysees, where the tour will again finish, Felix Levitan, the race director. began his discourse with a quote from Charles de Gaulle "One can do nothing great without great

His analogy referred to Laurent Fignon and Bernard Hinault, the two French riders who finished first and second in this year's Tour, and who Levilan hopes will do battle again next year.

The 4:000-kilometre route which be presented is less demanding than this year's route, and it should suit men like Sean Kelly, who must have high hopes of victory following a fifth place this year on a far more mountainous route.

For the first time in nine years the Alps will be climbed before the Pyrenees as the race proceeds round France in a clockwise direction. Because of this the Albure stages will be easier. The first will see a mountain-top finish on the not-tooa stage through the Chautreuse massif to Grenoble and the last is a partly uphill umestral of 35 kilometres to the plateau of the

There are only two stages in the Pyrrices, which should give Robert third stage win in these mountains, but should not be beyond the scope of Kelly.

The tour starts in Brittany on June 28, includes four time trials and one stage of cobbles in northern France, and finishes on July 21, with the tradinogal six circuits of the Champs Elysees.

Yet such are the unpredictable twists of racing and breeding that is precisely what he will probably achieve there roday with the result of that pairing. Don Giovanni, in the Nailsworthy Handicap Chase, a race which his trainer, Fred Winter, and jockey, John Francome, also won 12 months

With 25 mares, 17 foals, 14 yearlings and 28 horses in yearlings and to norses in training, besides shares in many of the top stallions, the Howard de Walden breeding operation is very much geared to the upper end of the Flat racing

But their owner has been in the game long enough to smile and take a philosophical attitude when one of his highpowered matings does not quite have the envisaged results. Dennis Aubern, carrying the colours made immortal by Arkle, could be a big danger to my nap if he gets his act together. He was not the safest jumpers last season when he fell or unseated his rider in two of his last three races. Yet he still managed to win another at Ludlow by 20 lengths and he will be the sharper for his effort on the same course last Half-Free a stable com-panion of Don Giovanni in Upper Lambourn, would have a good chance of winning the Churchdown Handicap Chase at his best. After all, he did win the Mildmay of Flete Challenge Cup over today's course and

Guest makes a winning move with Avec Coeur

Nelson Guest, who sold his Newmarket stables last week, has quickly found new premises -thanks to his nephew, the jockey Rae Guest. Nelson's yard was purchased by Terry Ramsden, owner of the Irish 1,000 Guineas winner Katies, and Alan Bailey will move in there at the end of next month. Now Guest, who originally expressed misgiving about staying in Newmarket, will remain in the town, in a yard owned by Rac

Nelson Guest said: "Originally Rae was going to lease the yard to Michael Albina, but he took another place in Newmarket. Rae told me about the deal falling through, so I told him it would be ideal for me. It has 17 boxes, and even better, I managed to knock him down on the rent.

Guest celebrated his move by landing the Brighthelmstone Nur-sery at Brighton yesteday with Avec Cocur (14-1), who followed up his

Alternatives to Seoul

Rome (Reuter) - Franco Carraro, the head of the Italian Olympic Committee, was quoted here today as saying support was growing for the idea of moving the 1988 Games from Seoul to another site to avoid boycotts. Several people at a meeting of European Olympic committees in Rome had privately expressed frank that there might be expressed fears that there might be politically inspired boycotts if the Games were held in the South Korean capital, he said.

"There are quite a lot of murmurings that it would be better to shift the Seoul Games to 1992. finding another solution for 1988, Carrarro said in a daily newspaper.
"By 1992 the world picture may have changed." Paris and Barcelona have been suggested as alternative

Monique Berlioux, director of the International Olympic Committee, rejected the idea. "The IOC and its president have already replied - w cannot change the venue of the next Olympic Games," she said.

RESIDENTIAL PROPERTY

British still best customers for the Costa mongers

By Diana Wildman

Property developers along Spain's Costa del Sol are still promoting and selling to a predominately British market. The frenetic pruchasing of the past four years dropped during the spring and summer months but there is now a market of UK buyers wanting a property in the sun

For some inexplicable reason the majority of UK purchasers forgo the services of a solicitor. There are few problems but it must be considered an extremely short-sighted move, especially as the costs involved are only a few hundred pounds.

That is a small price to pay for advice that for example, ensures that there is no outstanding mortgage on the property.

The 4 000 acre Sotogrande estate, established 20 years ago, has managed to stay removed from the building activity affecting so much of the Costa del Sol. One reason is that it is at the far western end of the coast, just 20 minutes from Gibralter but almost a two-hour drive from Malaga, whilst Marbella is 45 minutes from the airport.

Sotogrande facilities include two championship golf courses, two polo fields, a tennis complex, riding stables, beach club, international school and its own estate office.

There is a small selection of large, individually-designed 15-year-old villas for sale. One is Los Arcos, for which Christopher Stephenson International wants offers in the region of $1.5 million.

This Moorish-style house, set in secluded gardens with a large pool, has five main bedroom suites and four large reception rooms. Details are available from Christopher Stevenson. The White House, East Garston, Newbury, Berkshire RG16 7EY, tel: 048839 654.

Spec building

However, speculative building has crept into a corner of this vast estate. This is Sotogolf, being built near the entrance to the Sotogrande estate above the old golf course, which will consist of 90 three-and four-bedroom traditionally-styled town houses grouped around swimming pools and tennis courts. Sixteen houses are ready for occupation at prices ranging from £62,000 to £68,000, but the leisure facilities will not be ready till January. Fincasol, of 4 Bridge Street, Salisbury, SP12LX (0722 26444), are the agents for Sotogolf and for Puerto Sotogrande, a five-year-old development of beach-side apartments and riverbank town houses set within the main Sotogrande estate.

Out of the 378 Puerto Sotogrande units completed in the seven low-rise blocks, 329 are sold, so are three ment with separate swimming pools for children and providing sailing, tennis and windsurfing.

apartments out of 24. Seven of the 12 penthouses have been sold from plan with construction not due to start till later this year for completion in autumn 1985.

Launching prices range from £42,337 for a one-bedroom apartment to £232,558 for a four-bedroom penthouse with private pool and terraces with all-round views

Puerto Sotogrande has its own beach club and facilities which include a 24 hour security patrol service. It also has the greatest commodity of all at its disposal – space, because its distance from the jet-set activities at Marbella means land values are lower.

Detailed planning permission has already been granted for a 1,500-berth internationally-renowned marina at Puerto Banus, just outside Marbella, offers a total contrast in holiday living to the leisure facilities of Sotogrande.

Jardines del Puerto, which is under construction behind Puerto Banus, is being built in the same traditional Andalucian whitewashed pueblo-style architecture: The first of 33 one, two-and three-bedroom luxury apartments, out of 180 is due for completion in next summer and is being marketed between £40,800 and £99,600.

Jardines del Puerto will be well-landscaped; essential because of the proximity to the Puerto Banas access road. Its leisure complex includes swimming pools, tennis and squash courts and an indoor recreation area with sauna, jacuzzi and gymnasium. Every apartment has underground garaging and the grounds will be'- covered by 24 security. Details from Euro Property Advisers in association with Winkworth, 27a New Street. Salisbury SP1 2PH (2722 330847). An exhibition featuring Jardines del Puerto and other Costa del Sol properties is being held tomorrow and Friday at London's Cafe Royal, Regent Street, from 11-8.

A wide selection of good-quality individual re-sale villas - slightly inland in the footbills of the Sierra Blanca behind and above Marbella - are available from £15.000 through Sturgis-International, 61 Park Lane, London, WIY 3 TB (493 1693).

Luxury Flats where Jack was all right

The former country home of J B Priestley on the Isle of Wight has been converted into six luxury flats, four of which are for sale through Sir Francis Pittis and Son of Newport (Newport

Brook Hill House was completed in 1914 entirely of Caen Stone to the orders of the first Lord Mottistone, in whose family the house remained until 1946 when Priestley acquired it. The house is in woodland above the hamlet of Brook less than three miles from Freshwater, and overlooks the Channel,

The four two-bedroom flats, with 999 year leases, range from £82,000 to £103.500.

A two bedroom town house in Bury Walk, Chelsea, owned by Celia Sandys, granddaughter of Sir Winston. Churchill, is offered at £350,000 through W A Ellis and Russell Simpson, joint agents. The three floored property includes a selfcontained basement flat.

£850,000 whirl

Nearly 200 apartments in Lowndes Square, Belgravia, until now available on seven year leases, are now to be offered on 75 years leases by Sun Life Assurances Society, who are selling eight refurbished flats through Allsop and Co and

They range from two bedromms with two bathrooms at £160,000 to an £850,000 apartment with seven bedrooms, three reception rooms and four bathrooms.

All have fully fitted kitchens and marble tiled bathrooms, many with whirlpool baths.

Number 22, Royal Crescent, Bath, a Grade I Georgian house which is one of the last on the splendid-Crescent to have been maintained in its entirety and not split into flats, is for sale through Humberts' offices in London and Chippenham. More than £200,000 is wanted for the freehold of the house, built by John Wood Jamior between 1767 and 1775, and retaining many original features, including the Bath stone floors to the entrance hall and pine boarded floors in the main rooms. Accommodation includes four reception rooms, eight bedrooms and four bathrooms. The house has a garden and garaging for six cars.

This is the ultimate – a real home from Holme

There are several people, it appears, house has to be approved by the who are not only willing but eager to commissioners. While they want to spend more than £5m for a house in get the best possible price, the highest London. The Holme, in Regent's Park is not just any house of course. Designed by Decimus Burton and completed in 1818, it is one of the few remaining "Nash" villas in the Park and has grounds of 4.5 acres running down to the lake.

The Holme was put on the market by the Crown Estate Commissioners in July, with the stipulation that the property, recently used as part of Bedford College, should revert to its former residential use as a singlefamily house.

Knight Frank and Rutley, who are handling the sale for the Commissioners, have now issued a "final announcement" about the property before taking it off the market by the end of October, It was always intended that the house should be on the market for a limited period and it is hoped that the sale will be completed by the end of the year.

Not surprisingly, for a house described as the "most important house in London to come on to the market since the war", the agents have received considerable interest and several offers to buy it. It has been made clear that no offers will be entertained until the end of the marketing period, after which the potential buyers must make their bids. The would-be owners of The Holme come from both Britain and overseas, and the person who finally takes possession of this magnificent get the best possible price, the highest bid will not necessarily be the winning bid, for they are determined that the new owner will be an "acceptable" person to live in such a property.

The house, which has 40 rooms was in continuous private residential use from 1818 to 1939, owned between the wars by George Dance, the songwriter and impresario, who carried out alterations and additions. and then by Mrs Marshall Field. Since then, 40 years of institutional use have "ruined" it, in the words of Mr Peter Kearon, partner in Knight Frank and Rutley, and it now needs

Once that is done, the owner will receive a new 60-year Crown lease, but he has yet another responsibility to open the garden and grounds to the public at least four times a year.

The only other comparable houses in London in the agents' view, are Buckingham Palace, Lambeth Palace, and Winfield House also in Regent's Park, the home of the US Ambassador, none of which is likely to come on to the market. As Mr Kearon said when the house was offered for sale. "We know of no other London house in the middle of the capital of that size and quality and we think you cannot find anything like it in any othe capital city - New York, Rome, Paris, or anywhere".

London's Limehouse, briefly but ecstatically shines. Miss Gish, in a specially filmed preamble to the film. spoils it for us by revealing what is more or less true: that everyone in the film ends up dead. But at least she balances this disservice by putting Broken Blossoms into its historical perspective with her reminder (again more or less true) that in making his film, Griffith put tragic poetry on the screen for the first time. Sody-five years later, we are tempted to dende both the film's excessive villainy and its virtue. But for sheer terror, is there anything in modern cinema to surpas Gish's agony after she has locked father hacking way at the door with

in May and Mr Ponting has sent a memorandum to Mr Heseltine urging the questions be answered. He told the Secretary of State that Mr Stanley, after consultations with 10 Downing Street, suggested that questions including parliamentary questions should not be answered on military

Mr Ponting, Mr Amlet said, had told Mr Heseltine there was no reason for withholding information adding that "there are already sound and tactical reasons for answering Mr Dalyell rather than letting information come out piece-

Answering Mr Dalyell would "let us give a better picture" of events such as the limitations of reaching Conqueror in the South Atlantic.

The documents became the centre of a search for a leak in the ministry after Mr Dalyell had passed them to the Foreign Affairs Committee chairman, Sir Anthony Kershaw, who returned them to Mr Heseltine.

Mr Jonathan Caplan, for Mr Ponting, asked Mr Richard Hastie-Smith, deputy 'under secretary at the Ministry of Defence responsible for civilian staff, why he had taken a letter of immediate resignation from Mr Ponting on the day he made his statement to the police when it was normal for a civil servant in such a position of possible prosecution to be

"When I took the letter I did not know whether it would be accepted. He denied having told Mr Ponting that everyone in the ministry thought the case did not merit the Official Secrets Act.

Mr Caplan called a second prosecution witness Mr Richard Mottram, private secretary to Mr Heseltine. Mr Mottram told the court that questions about the Belgrano had been raised by Mr Denzil Davies, the Opposition spokes-man on defence, in March and Mr Ponting was asked to draft

Mr Mottram said it was correct that Mr Ponting was asked to draft two different replies on the sinking of the Belgrano for Mr Stanley. One said the ship was detected and sighted before May 2. the other did not give the date. Mr Mottram said a meeting had considered a reply to questions on whether the Belgrano had been sighted before the day it was sunk. He said: "There emerged at that meeting a general view that information should

Mr Pouting prepared draft replies for questions from Dalyeli but Mr Heseltine did not use the draft and gave no information. Mr Ponting had included details that the Belgrano had changed course and had spent 11 hours heading for Argentina when it was sunk.

The 22-storey tower block. which partially collapsed in 1968 after a gas explosion, killing five people, has been emptied so fire and structural its faults can be examined.

It will probably take about a year to rehouse the remaining families. Council officers are negotiating with the Depart-ment of Environment over the extent of their tests on the compensation which may be building as reported in The payable to tenants and to Times.

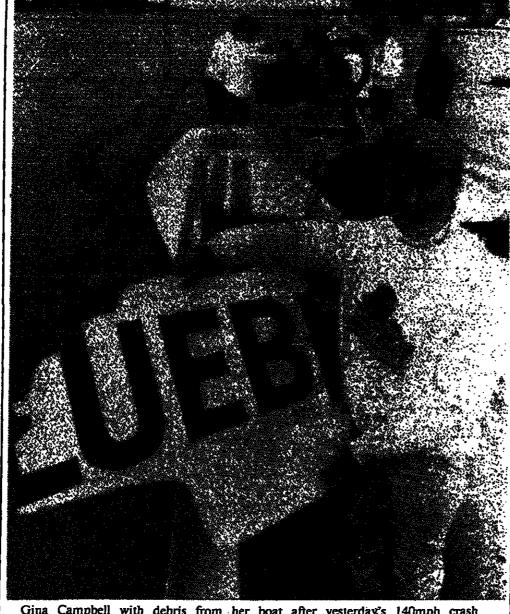

Newham Council in east Newham Council for making London met last night to structural surveys, thought to dismiss plans to move 600 have cost about £1 m.

Repair and refurbishment of one of the blocks would cost more than £5m, according to one estimate, whereas demolition would cost £500,000.

Yesterday Mr Sam Webb, an architect who surveyed Ronan Point for the Newham Tower Block Tenants Campaign, said he had offered to help Newham tests can be carried out.

It seems certain it will be dismantled so that the extent of tants, Building Design Partnership, carry out structural tests on the building.

Gina Campbell with debris from her boat after yesterday's 140mph crash

Campbell's brush with death

Continued from page 1 said Miss Campbell, she and her back-up team decided to make another run "just to see what the boat had in her".

She was travelling on the eastern part of the course at almost 140mph when the bows of the catamaran-type boat began to rise out of the water near the 1,000-metre marker. "There was nothing I could do about it. It just took off and turned over and then smashed to matchwood. The rescue boat was there instantly and as they pulled me from the water I told them not to let my boat sink without rescuing Mr Whoppit, which they managed to do." The little bear was all that

There was more bad luck for Miss Campbell yesterday: as her mechanics worked on the engine and splintered bits of the boat salvaged from the.

She does not know if she will be able to make another speed

The idea is that the new prosecution service should give priority to defendants in cus-tody. If a case overruns the limit, the defendant would have to be released, but would still face trial within the time limit set for bail cases. For a defendant on bail, the proceedings would have to be stopped once the time limit had

The time limits will mean that witnesses' memories will be fresher. And defendants who might eventually be acquitted non-custodiai or given non-custodial sentences would not be detained unnecessarily while the case against them was being pre-

Mr Brittan also told the conference he was "certainly ready" to consider the possi-bility of new legislation on picketing in his review of the law on public order.

Mr Gerald Kautman, the sbadow Home Secretary, accused the Government of taking another step, with Mr Brittan's package, towards a centralist state. "The Government is taking away some of the last fragments of democratic accountability to which chief constables are answerable.

"Local police authorities, elected by the people, have hardly any powers in relation to their chief constables.

They cannot dismiss him without the Home Secretary's approval and under the new change they will not even be able to suspend him without approval", he said.

It was yet another example of the Government creating a centralist state. On the issue of financial aid for police authorities, Mr Kaufman said the bills would be very big indeed.
It is the Government's duty to pay the lot." Before Mr Brittan's announcement on meeting police costs, authorities had to find from the rates a maximum of the product of a penny rate for additional expenditure, up to August 31, 1984. This limit did not apply to spending after that date. But the Home Scretary had promised to keep the position under review

Praying to keep bishop in check

Conference opened here yesterday against the background of the worsening bishops' strike.

What a worried party wanted to know from its leaders was: How long can the bishops continue to keep supplies of their prayers from reaching Tory economic poli-cies? Is the Government prepared to put in troops, in the form of the specialized padre squads, to man the cathedrals, especially if the dispute drags on to peak-playing time at Christmas.

Ministers involved in the dispute - such as the Government's supremo prayer supplier, vicar's son Mr John Selwyn Gummer – were understood to be insisting in the conference corridors, that, despite the campaign of intimidation led by the bishops' leader Dr Robert Runcie, a third of Britain's bishops were continuing to work normally.

But many Tories believed this figure to be absurdly optimistic. They were more worried by the situation in the key. Durban and York key Durham and York prayerfields. Conservative conference traditionally open with a short religious service, although most Conservatives do not adhere to any organized religion (they are Anglicans). Because of the background of tension, more than usual interest was this year attacked to this event. The party had been sickened by the scenes, night after night on their men in large mitres and waving huge, viciously-hooked sticks, trying to force the elected government to abandon its whole economic strategy.

Minsters believe that the nerve centre of the campaign is the tightly-knit southern community of Canterbury. The describe Canterbury as the "South Yorkshire" or the "Barnsley" of the Runcie organization. And Dr Runcie, they hint, is backed by a political party which, when it tried to win power through the ballot box, has been consistently rejected by the British people (the SDP).

Despite the intimidation. Canon John Hester, the vicar of Brighton, yesterday turned up to work at the service. Police ringed the building. He read two prayers. Working alongside him were a Metho-dist and a Roman Catholic. Neither of those two groups is yet involved in the dispute.

The Methodists have traditionally been regarded as anti-Tory and were behind the founding of at least one extremist British political party (Labour). These days, the Catholics could go either way. In places such as Nicaragua they are left wing -those, that is, who are not in prison. There are few Nicaraguans at Brighton.

So, the Reverend Matthew McInerney, the Roman Catholic Dean of Brighton, could well be, from the Tories point of view, a sound man.

Portugal sets about cleaning the Algarve

Minister for Quality of Life, Dr Francisco Sousa Tavares, said Algarve beaches were danger-ously polluted and that those near Lisbon, in the Estoril-Cascais area, were so polluted they should be put off-limits to bathers. His remarks coincided with the cancellation of charter flights to the Algarve by Swedish and Belgian tour operators because of an epidemic of salmonella and other disorders among tourists.

Earlier in the season, several British tourists who had visited

The Portuguese Government the Algarve contracted Legionhas established an emergency naires' disease. A report submitcommission to draw up plans ted to Lisbon health authorities for eliminating pollution on beaches in the Algarve.

It was set up after the insufficiently chlorinated water and poor health practices in food distribution. Wells have been tainted by polluted seawater because of overpumping during a long drought. Many of the projects needed had been started but then stopped for lack of funds. Now they will be revived. Parliament is talking in terms of the equivalent of an additional £2.5m over the next five years for sewage treatment and other special funds for local governments for sanitation.

the 'unholy row' between church leaders and politicians says: "Criti-cisms of picket line violence, and Arther Scargills' extremism, have-been just as loud as criticism of economic policy. Sadly, it seems that many MPs only hear those comments which they disagree with." It adds: "But there are times wither a plague on both their houses." when a plague on both their houses makes a worthwhile thought for the
